

I am a resident of the State of Indiana and am taking advantage of the state's "no call" law. This has enabled me to enjoy my evenings free of bothersome phone calls from telemarketers looking to sell me furnace repairs or long distance. I do not think that a federal law is needed, particularly one that would supersede state law and potentially ruin my peace and quiet at home. If anything the federal government should assist states in creating telephone privacy laws with teeth rather than passing federal law that would lessen a state's.
